1. In the Czechoslovak Cabinet debates concerning the treaty with Poland previous to its signature, a separate memorandum was adopted and sent to Moscow. It informed the Russians that, according to Czechoslovak interpretation, nothing in the treaty about to be signed may be construed as granting minority rights to the Polish minority in Czechoslovakia.
2. The memorandum grew out of initial discussions when the advance Polish interpretation of the treaty included minority rights. This made possible the opposition led by Zenkl, which was won over on condition that a separate memorandum be sent to the Russians.
